Biography

My current and recent scholarship has focused on: (i) teacher labor markets in developing countries, (ii) implications of growing educational privatization in low-income countries and (iii) promises and challenges of educating youth in resource-constrained environments. In each of these areas through a diverse portfolio of scholarly activities I have contributed to academic discourses and generated insights relevant to policymakers and practitioners. Informed by my experiences teaching several methods classes and aligned with my commitment to connect my research to practical challenges of policy and practice, I have also devoted increasing attention to (iv) exploring the strengths and limitations of large-scale administrative, national and cross-national databases for international education policy research. I serve as a co-editor at Comparative Education Review and greatly enjoy working closely with doctoral students on diverse research projects across the world.
