eTourism revolutions

eTourism revolutions The World Wide Web on the Internet has emerged as the pervasive and robust platform for the tourism destination distribution and management. The Web 2.0 and consumer generated content is developing those issues further and develops them on a global scale. Only destinations that can take full advantage of the opportunities will be able to capitalise on the benefits in the future There are still several major challenges for eTourism to be successful including: ? Modernising operations to use technology enabled proactive and reactive marketing ? Utilise DMSs for strategic and tactical management and marketing ? Integrating content from several provides ? Provide up to date, comprehensive and consistent data, image banks and information on facilities and attractions. ? Take advantage of user generated content ? Deal with online reputation and social networking ? Using social networking for marketing and for brand management ? Driving social networking and user-generated content ? Modernising legislation and adapting to new realities ? Fight internal politics and adopt a market focused approach ? Coordination at a regional, National, European Level ? Integrating all tourism offering, including SMTEs ? Collaboration with eIntermediaries and dealing with distribution plurality ? Real time services and the Service of Now ? Cocreation of Experiences ? Use ICTs to develop virtual marketplaces to maximise multiplier effects ? Develop offerings on multi-channel platforms including mobile and Interactive Digital Television ? Location and Context Based Services ? Modernise the mind frame of a number of actors in the industry The competitiveness of tourism organisations and destinations in the future will depend on their ability to manage eTourism in a strategic and operational way to generate technology empowered constant innovation to manage consumer experiences and local assets and resources profitably and sustainably.
