Assistant Professor at University of Florida

Gainesville, FL, US

Young-Rock Hong is a health services researcher and medical sociologist.

Biography

Young-Rock Hong is an assistant professor in the Health Services Research, Management and Policy program in the College of Public Health and Health Professions at the University of Florida. Young-Rock is a health services researcher and medical sociologist, studying the social contexts of medical practice and interactions of care providers and patients across the continuum of collaborative care. His work focuses on reducing healthcare disparities and inequalities while maintaining a standardized quality of care. To achieve this goal, he aims to understand the social and cultural factors in an effective patient-provider relationship and their trust-building; to examine health consequences of interactions in care delivery, and to develop and evaluate patient-centered care interventions.

Areas of Expertise
